章节摘录

Most children , even the youngest of children , are delighted to be around cats and dogs . But these pets carry plenty of germs and allergens ' , prompting researchers to ask : Are cats and dogs really safe for children?

A study finds that , contrary to many parents ' fears , owning cats or dogs does not increase a child ' S risk of developing allergies , and in fact , may actually protect them . The study ' s lead author , Dr . Dennis Ownby of the Medical College of Georgia , says that even he was “ very surprised by the results . Ownby and colleagues followed more than 470 children from birth to age 6 or 7 comparing those exposed to cats and dogs during their first year of life to those who were not . By using skin-prick tests for detecting common allergies , the researchers found that , contrary to what many doctors had been taught for years , children who had lived with a pet were not at greater risk . Even more remarkable , children who had two or more dogs or cats had an even greater reduction , up to 77 percent , in risk of allergies . Researchers suggest this protective effect may be the result of early exposure to lots of bacteria that are carried by dogs and cats . Exposing young children to these bacteria helps “ exercise their immune systems early in life SO that they're better able to resist allergic diseases later . “ There ' s something very important in that first year of life when the immune system is developing that we can retain it away from an allergic response , ” said Dr . William Davis . And while researchers are not encouraging parents to buy dogs or cats just to reduce a child's allergy risk。 they say if a family already has one or more animals , there ' s no need to get rid of them .
