章节摘录

版权页：插图： This is the first thing he wants to do. A more important and burning issue is that he wants the government to develop year-round maintenance for the Yumai Highway so that traffic can flow all the time and Yumai won't be an "isolated island" anymore. "This is also important for national defense," Dawa says seriously. He believes that clear roads can help solidify frontier defense, ship local products to the outside world and bring more benefits to the locals. Dawa's aspiration is echoed by his fellow villagers. Qunzong's grocery store is only one wall away from Daquzong's. Fifty meters away, Zhuoma Lazong and her husband Pema are building a new store and hotel, which will be finished very soon. Qunzong and Daquzong feel little pressure these days. The new shop and hotel may compromise their business. Zhuoma Lazong on the other hand, doesn't want to affect her sister's business either. But this is life. Modern business and culture are emerging in this remote village and the tranquility of Yumai is being affected. But for people of Yumai, no matter how much livestock they have, no matter how they run the restaurant, shop or hotel, they are expecting a wonderful life, not a wealthy one. Tashi Deji, granddaughter of Tsering Cuomu is the first student admitted into a Tibetan middle school in Yumai. Her grandmother is filled with the sense of achievement. From initial maladjustment, to today's hard study and phone calls to her grandparents, Tashi Deji has been mainstreamed into urban life. "Her life and study are good," Tsering Cuomu smiles happily. Tsering Cuomu hopes Tashi Deji can come back to Yumai, or work in Qusum after graduation, "This is my personal idea. I don't know her plan."
