章节摘录

“ For one thing , as water backed up behind the dam , almost 100 , 000 Egyptians had to choose between giving up their family homes and being submerged along with ancient and priceless temples that were part of Egypt ' s cultural heritage. But there have been far more devastating results. Now that the Nile River floodplain is deprived of its annual enrichment with silt , artificial fertilizer has to be trucked in at a cost of 1 00 million dollars a year—a cost carried by the subsistence farmers who make , on the average , less than a hundred dollars a year each. Furthermore , now there is nothing to wash away the previous year ' s silt buildup in the soil. And with silt deposits no longer compensating for erosion , the fertile river delta is shrinking—and an alarming part of what remains has completely dried up. Restoring the delta with pumps, drains, and wells may cost more than the dam itself. ”

“ Ironically , evaporation as well as bottom seepage from the new lake filling in behind the dam is so great that the lake basin may never fill up to predicted levels. So nobody can live around the lake because nobody knows for sure where the shoreline will be. More seriously , there is less water to go around than there was before. And even though some 700 , 000 new acres (about 1.6 million hectares) have been opened up for agriculture , the population outgrew the potential food increase even before the dam was finished. At the same time , with the nutrient-rich flow of the Nile turned off, another major food source—the sardines , shrimp , and mackerel that flourished in the enriched waters off the delta—has declined catastrophically. Worse yet, the lake and the irrigation networks have so accelerated the spread of blood fluke that half the Egyptian populace are now carriers of schistosomiasis (血吸虫病). In irrigated areas , where eight out of ten humans live , women can expect to live only to age twenty-seven , men to age twenty-five. ”

The Hawaiian Goose Another clear example of human ignorance of nature's delicate balance is seen in the near extinction of the Hawaiian Goose or Nene. It was estimated in the late eighteenth century that the population of Hawaii ' s unique variety of goose stood at about 25 , 000. In a matter of fifty years the population had dropped to approximately thirty birds. There were undoubtedly multiple causes for the decline in the Nene population , and virtually all of them resulted , either directly or indirectly , from humans. The most disastrous activities of humans included hunting with firearms , ranching activities, and the building of beach resorts. There is little doubt that the Nene ' s near extinction was hastened after shotguns were brought to Hawaii. It seems reasonable to assume that many more Nenes were killed when guns became common. In a similar fashion , as people moved further inland on the islands they began to open more and more land for the development of ranches and beach resorts. These developments forced the geese out of their natural nesting and breeding ranges. As these ranches and resorts became more plentiful , the Nene population accordingly decreased.
